Xenofeminists reject the idea that technology is inherently male or patriarchal. Instead, they see technology as a potential tool for liberation. They are interested in exploring how technology can be used to create new ways of living and organizing society.

Xenofeminists are also interested in the future. They believe that the future is not something that is predetermined, but something that we can shape through our actions.

The Xenofeminist Manifesto

The Xenofeminist Manifesto is a collection of essays that explores the core ideas of xenofeminism. The manifesto was written by a group of six anonymous authors, who call themselves Laboria Cuboniks.

The essays in the manifesto cover a wide range of topics, including gender, technology, capitalism, and the future. The authors argue that these are all interconnected issues, and that we cannot understand any of them in isolation.
